Mosquito: A Fistful of Bitcoins is the debut feature film of film-making duo Tom Block and Laura Revell. Equipped with an estimated total budget of £2,000, this quirky cult movie spoof and time-travel comedy has taken them from the volcanic landscapes of the Canary Islands to the towering skyscrapers of London's Canary Wharf.

Mosquito: A Fistful of Bitcoins is aimed at the Internet generation whilst simultaneously poking fun at it through hipster characters and the depiction of Internet phenomena like the meme. It tackles current threats and issues such as online surveillance, global warming and Internet centralisation, but most ...

... importantly, it's a film to make you laugh at what we are all thinking, and to think about what we are all laughing at. Mosquito: A Fistful of Bitcoins stands as an accomplished example of resourcefulness in no budget film-making and proves that persistent hard work and unique style can outshine financial restrictions.

SHORT SYNOPSIS:

Young Mosquito goes about her daily life in the post-apocalyptic wastelands of 2084. All of a sudden, she finds herself teleported into the present day, where the eccentric scientist Albert has just tested his new invention on her: the Timeotronic 5000. Things get off to a shaky start between the two until Albert introduces Mosquito to the Internet - his favourite pastime but her worst enemy. Will Mosquito be able to prevent the emerging digital dictatorship that she was born into?

MEDIUM SYNOPSIS:

The quirky, defiantly independent young Mosquito goes about her daily life in the post-apocalyptic wastelands of 2084, her only companion being her three-legged pet pup Hegel. Mosquito spends the morning listening to pirate radio and practicing her shooting. Meanwhile in the past – in the year 2015 to be exact - an eccentric British scientist named Albert is adding finishing touches to his newest invention: the time-travel machine Timeotronic 5000. On a trip to her fishing spot, Mosquito is suddenly teleported to the picturesque English countryside of the present day, straight into Albert's garden. Things get off to a shaky start between the two until Albert introduces Mosquito to the Internet - his favourite pastime but her worst enemy. Will Mosquito be able to prevent the emerging digital dictatorship that she was born into? What's Albert's well-kept secret and why does he want to dress Mosquito up as a hipster? And what roles do the small social media start-up Facetwatter and the NAS, the Nefarious Agency of Surveillance, play in all of this?

LONG SYNOPSIS:

The quirky, defiantly independent young Mosquito goes about her daily life in the post-apocalyptic wastelands of 2084, her only companion being her three-legged pet pup Hegel. Mosquito spends the morning listening to pirate radio and practicing her shooting. Meanwhile in the past – in the year 2015 to be exact - an eccentric British scientist named Albert is adding finishing touches to his newest invention: the time-travel machine Timeotronic 5000. On a trip to her fishing spot, Mosquito is suddenly teleported to the picturesque English countryside of the present day, straight into Albert's garden. Things get off to a shaky start between the two until Albert introduces Mosquito to the Internet - his favourite pastime but also her worst enemy. He embarks on teaching her its wondrous potential while she explains to him what the Internet of the future is like. It turns out that in 2084 the Internet is a force to be feared. It is abused by Dictator General Elias Menati III, head of the Nefarious Agency of Surveillance, or NAS, which uses the data-gathering social media service Facetwatter to control the entire population of the Serverlands, forcing them to submit, work and serve in a war against other worlds. Nonetheless, Mosquito is soon hooked, just like everybody else is. She sits in front of a world of information, and of course, plenty of funny cat videos. When Albert sends Mosquito to investigate undercover at the Facetwatter offices, she finds that the intentions behind Facetwatter were never evil to begin with. Will Mosquito be able to prevent the emerging digital dictatorship that she was born into? Will she prevent the corporate takeover of Facetwatter in time?
